家庭英语作文 篇4

home education , or home schooling , is a phenomenon which is both old and now。 it may seem to many like a strange idea , but years ago , it was the norm。 george washington and abraham lincoln both received their education at home。 and there is a growing trend for children to be educated at home。 an estimated two million american children , one source says , are taught in their own homes instead of going to regular schools。 the number of support groups , magazines and other resources for home-schooling families is also on the rise。 being comparatively rare cases in china , home schooling is repeatedly reported as an attractive and promising alternative。 parents who decide to home-school are not without reasons。 many may worry about the quality of education at regular schools。 they want to tailor the education of their children to their intelligence and aptitude。 they prefer to choose the subjects on their own。 they also think caring parents make the best teachers。 studies show that many home-schooled children really do very well。

proven benefits of home schooling are obvious。 but educating kids at home may not be the right choice for all families。 it may not be practical , and dose not constitute an important approach to children education。 with computer aided education more and more available and effective , school education has advantages home education can never catch up with。 no family has resources which is adequate for modern education。 parents , althoug they are most caring , cannot be competent and qualified as trained teachers。 a most discouraging fact is that children taught at home and do not go out to schools will develop strange characteristics which will eventually hinder them when they go out to society。 they are sure to lack ability and skills to cope with various intricate relationships which cannot not be acquired through home education environment。 and they will end up as crippled。

as the matter stands , home education is not so important as to deserve more merit than is already exaggerated。

家庭英语作文 篇5

Goethe said, He is the happiest, being king or peasant, who finds peace in his home It is true. Home is the warmest place in the world. Home is the harbor.No matter where you are, you would like to be back home in the end.

Home is the place which we often need to build. In order to create a kind of warm and intimate atmosphere, we must respect and understand each other.As a member of the family, it is not right to demand perfection from each other. The proper way is to cultivate flexibility, patience, and sense of humor. Parents can be more open-minded and trust their children, and the children should understand their parents pains. If we have spare time after supper, we may often communicate with each other and talk about what happened in the daytime. This type of conversation, called small talk, is of great importance because it often helps deepen the feelings between parents and children.

If we do so, I believe our home will always be sweet.

My mother had a brain teasers, is a rooster lay eggs in the house, the rooster lay eggs from which side fell to the house? I think: if the cock will not lay eggs! Then I said loudly: "the rooster lay eggs will not fall off from the house, because the cock this will not lay eggs. "The mother said," you are so smart, guess right. "At this moment, I burst with joy.

Then, Dad came out again. The toad saw a few swans in the sky. Why did they croak? Mother said, "because the toad wants to make friends with the swan." "No," said the father. "But I saw it in a book, and I said," because the toad wants to eat a swan. "That's right," Dad said. "

Finally, I came out, I came out of the word when people entered the door, and mom and dad said, "it's a flash." "Oh my God, you know it all!" I said.

家庭英语作文 篇8

China debates 'family values'

Most Chinese agree the family is undergoing tremendous change. But views on what that means run the gamut. Some feel society is headed for serious disorder due to a loss of values like sacrifice, family loyalty, and fidelity. Others see a better China emerging after a period of shakeout, with greater choice and maturity.

At one level, the fight is between traditionalists and progressives. Many of the former feel that an avaricious new money culture will corrupt China and send it into uncharted waters. They see women becoming sex objects and couples devaluing each other. They see the years from 1950 to 1980 as a stable period of happiness, when moral values were predominant and families found meaning in serving the state.

"The opening up of the 1980s is only now showing itself in the way wives and husbands are chosen," says Xia Xueluan, a professor at Beijing University. "Now, when a girl meets a boy the first question is, 'Do you have a house? Do you have a car?' This causes great strains in marriages, and on husbands, to produce income. I'm worried."

Progressives feel that few Chinese want to lose recent gains like choice. Both sexes are more liberated, they feel. In the past, marriage was limited by family background. Divorce was not allowed, often not even in abusive, dead-end situations.

"In the past, there was no money and people were forced to rely on others. The choice for a better life was simple: struggle for food and shelter," says Dong Zhiying with the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. "We all lived together and ate at the same table; we had 'salty or sweet' depending on what was available. Now you can order your own dishes."

Many in China do feel problems with the money culture are underestimated, but don't want a return to state dictates in their private lives. They feel that an obsession with grades, colleges, and jobs has led parents to ignore a traditional emphasis on good behavior, modesty, and politeness. They are troubled by studies showing rising levels of early teen sex and recent cases of teens involved in homicides. They want a form of new moral education that teaches a humane social contract.
